

Trust & Safety

GOALS SESSION 3

- You can explain what psychological safety is and why it makes or breaks team culture
- You recognize concrete behaviors that build or destroy trust in your team
- You take a conscious step to show vulnerability to a teammate

Without trust there is no real culture — only façade. Teams that dare to show vulnerability perform better, learn faster and last longer. Today we build that foundation.

EXERCISE 1 — TRUST BAROMETER

1 How Safe Do I Feel in Our Team?

Give an honest score from 1 to 10 for each situation below. There is no right or wrong answer.

I dare to admit mistakes in our team: ____/10

I dare to ask for help without feeling weak: ____/10

I dare to share my opinion even when it differs: ____/10

I feel supported after a bad match: ____/10

What stands out from your scores? Where is there room to grow?

EXERCISE 2 — BUILDING OR BREAKING TRUST

2 Concrete Behaviors

Write two behaviors that build trust in a team, and two that break trust — from your own experience.

BUILDS TRUST

BREAKS TRUST

Which behavior of your own could be breaking trust?

EXERCISE 3 — VULNERABILITY IN ACTION

3 Something I Never Talk About

Write one thing you find difficult in sports or in the team but rarely say out loud. You don't have to share this — but writing it down is already a step.

Which teammate could you most easily tell this to? Why that person?

What would sharing it deliver?

ACTION THIS WEEK

What concrete step will you take this week to increase trust in the team?

MENTAL RESILIENCE — REBUILDING TRUST

Write: what do you do when trust in the team is under pressure (after conflict, loss, or tension)? Your three steps to restore it.

"Vulnerability is not weakness. It is our greatest measure of courage."

— Brené Brown — researcher & author